

Snowy Day Beef Stew Recipe

When the weather is bone-chilling cold with gray skies, there's nothing I crave more than a big bowl of steaming beef stew! There's just something warming and comforting about the smell of a slow-cooked stew that warms up your body and puts you in a calm mood.

Yeah, that's great, but it's a pain to make, right? Wrong! Beef stew is probably one of the easiest things in the world to make. And, minus maybe a little bit of flour for browning the meat, it's fairly healthy as well. Come check out how we make snowy day beef stew on the Suburban Steader Suburban Homestead.

Beef stew is one of those "stick to your ribs" meals that almost everyone loves. It's a pretty easy prep and can be a 'set-it-and-forget-it' type meal, freeing you up to do other things around the house. The one tip I have for prep is to make sure you keep the heat quite low when browning the meat and sauteing the onions and garlic. You want the bottom of the pan to be brown, not black, when you deglaze it. Another thing to note is that sometimes this recipe can come out a little watery. If what you end up with is a little too watery for you, take a few cups of the broth out, make a roux (try 2tbsp flour to 2tbsp melted butter), add to the broth and return to the stew. That should thicken it up.

The recipe above is for a basic beef stew. Feel free to change things up as you see fit. Replace the onion with shallots, add other root vegetables like parsnips, turnips and even turnips if you want. My wife says the mushrooms give it an earthy flavor so, if that's not your thing, don't add them.

What I'm getting at is that the recipe I provided is a fairly basic canvas. Feel free to experiment and tweak it to make it your own.

In terms of serving, I go very simple. Beef stew is, at its core, a simple dish and does not need a lot of flash added to it. A nice piece of buttered sourdough bread goes quite well with it. I recommend a glass of the red wine you used to deglaze the pan or a good craft beer be served alongside it as well.
